This research aims to describe public accessibility in the formation of Sleman Regency regional regulations. Apart from that, it is also to reveal what obstacles there are in order to open public access in the formation of Regional Regulations in Sleman Regency.

This research is descriptive research that uses a qualitative approach. Research subjects were determined using purposive techniques. The research subjects in this study were members of the Sleman DPRD, Chair of the Commission at the Sleman DPRD, and leadership of the regional Legislative Body of the Sleman DPRD. Data was collected through semi-structured interviews with informants and collecting documentation. Checking the validity of the data uses the cross check data technique. Data analysis was carried out inductively with steps including data reduction, data categorization, data presentation, and drawing conclusions.

The results of the research show that in general the public has access to participate in the formation of laws and regulations through public hearings which have been running with limitations, hearings with citizens, mass media channels and the Legal Information Documentation Network media. The obstacles faced in the accessibility of public participation include limited public hearing budgets, online media is not widely accessed by the public and the public's voice in the mass media is not really taken into consideration by authorized institutions.
