ABSTRACT

Pancasila is a way of life and the basis of the state which should be actualized in society and campus life. It is reasonable to suspect that there are still many phenomena in life, both in general society and in the campus community, which show that the practice of Pancasila values is still far away and has not led to ideal conditions. The UNY academic community as a scientific community has a more critical, objective and future-oriented view so that the contribution of their thoughts is highly expected in reflecting on the practice of Pancasila values and efforts to improve them. Thus, the purpose of this study is to conduct a reflective analysis of the views of the UNY academic community regarding the practice of Pancasila values in social life and in campus life.

The research approach is descriptive qualitative and interpretive. The subjects of this research were S1, S2, S3 students and lecturers at UNY who were selected purposively according to the research objectives. The data collection technique was a focus group discussion method supplemented by interviews. The data analysis technique uses the Saldana version of the coding technique and the philosophical interpretation technique.

The results of the study found that (1) The basic principle of practicing Pancasila values is the development of policies and actions that reflect the principles of kinship and mutual cooperation based on empathy and tolerance. This must begin with an awareness to continue to practice the values of Pancasila in the life of society, nation and state. (2) The actualization of the values of social justice in people's lives has seen the development of the nature of kinship and mutual cooperation, which is based on the nature of empathy and tolerance for fellow citizens of the nation mandatory.
