

Stakeholders Perception of Accounting Student Organizations in Indonesia

by Ponty SP Hutama, Sukirno, Mimin Nur Aisyah, Budi Tiara Novitasari

ABSTRACT

This study examines the importance of practitioner involvement in academic programs and curricula which have recently begun to attract attention. Practitioners can engage with students is through their involvement in accounting student organizations. This study conducted a survey of students, faculty members, and practitioners to understand their perceptions of accounting organizations. This study categorizes the activities of accounting organizations into four areas and examines the perceived value of the activities or activities of accounting organizations. This research shows that students, faculty members, and practitioners consider that accounting ormawa provide broad knowledge and opportunities in several activities that support the development of students' abilities and transition from higher education to professional careers. This study concludes that stakeholders assess accounting organizations as providing opportunities for students to gain knowledge about community service, skill development, and networking, so that the three activities are at the top of the list of useful activities that accounting organizations do. However, career placement activities and introduction to corporate culture still in the last rank.

Kata Kunci: Keywords: accounting student organization, practitioner involvement, job placement, skill development, networking, and community service.