ABSTRACT

Physical education has strategic position in preventing radicalism and terrorist violent action through contra narrative. This is apparent when we all want the prevention of radicalism and extrem violence among students in particular and youth in general. This community service aimed at 1) improving teachers' knowledge about programs for preventing radicalism and extrem violence through sport activities, 2) exploring various opportunities to implement those programs in physical education learning. This community service has been done online. The method being employed in the socialization program was lecturing and discussion, virtual demonstration, workshop, and focus group discussion. In order to ensure the quality and accountability of this community service program, the team has prepared some evaluation methods including instructor observation and focus group discussion. Our program has been expected to benefit physical education teachers in developing their understanding about, skills to, and program design for preventing radicalization and extrem violence through sport activity.
