ABSTRACT

The problem experienced by partners is that guidance and counseling services are currently handled directly by class teachers or subject teachers, so that these teachers have a dual role as class or subject teachers, as well as guidance and counseling teachers. The aim of this community service is to provide insight into guidance and counseling as a basis for services to students for FIPP UNY Laboratory Pedagogy Elementary School teachers. The service method is carried out through providing training on guidance and counseling in elementary schools and multicultural education as well as guidance and counseling. This activity stage includes providing instructions, modeling, and practice. The assessment results show that there is an increase in elementary school teachers' understanding, before being given the training material and after being given the training material, the teachers can even convey narratively about good practice experiences or best practices that have been carried out in helping students' problems.
